25X1RECENT MILITARY CONSTRUCTION ACTIVITY,
SHEN-YANG MILITARY REGION, CHINA

1. Sixteen newly constructed barracks areas were identified in the Shen-yang Military Region of China

Seven additional barracks areas, previously identified in the region, have undergone major expansion. Table 1 provides descriptions of the newly constructed and newly expanded barracks areas. An annotated map of the region (Figure 1) is keyed to the table.

2. Although the major concentration of newly constructed barracks areas was in the southern portion of the military region, four newly built barracks areas (items 1 and 3-5, Figure 1 and Table 1) are near the China-USSR border. These areas were initially used for weapons dispersal, and tents provided shelter for personnel. Since the 1969 border clashes the Chinese have had a slow but continuous buildup in the border area. During the past two years, however, the Chinese have made a concentrated effort to construct permanent facilities for personnel deployed in these areas. The barracks construction in this section of the region is probably part of a continuing effort to strengthen the defenses along the border.

3. In the southern portion of the military region, the Chinese are returning to the trend of constructing some of the new barracks areas in a more military-type design. Following the 1969 border conflict, the trend in China was to construct dispersed barracks areas with small units scattered throughout the countryside. The new trend of constructing regiment-sized areas, with repeated patterns and uniformity, is becoming more and more evident throughout northeast China.

4. Figure 2 presents one example of this newer type of barracks area construction. An established barracks area which has undergone expansion is illustrated in Figure 3.
